Key Takeaways from Moriah's Podcast Appearance

The Power of Planning: Protecting Your Legacy

Estate planning isn't just about what happens after you pass—it's about ensuring your wishes are honored while you're alive. Moriah emphasized that planning early allows individuals to age with dignity and maintain financial security. She works closely with families on estate administration, asset protection, and Medicaid planning to help them navigate life's complexities.

A Personal Journey: From Family Experience to Legal Advocacy

Moriah's passion for elder law stems from personal experience. As a law student, she was helping families with estate planning while simultaneously navigating her own family's challenges—her grandfather's passing and her grandmother's Alzheimer's diagnosis. This dual perspective fueled her mission to provide practical, compassionate legal counsel to others facing similar situations.

Misconceptions About Estate Planning and Elder Law

Many people think estate planning is only about distributing assets after death. In reality, it plays a crucial role in ensuring financial stability during one's lifetime. Key myths debunked by Moriah:

- "It's too early to plan." Estate planning is beneficial at any stage of life, even for young adults needing basic legal directives.
- "It's too late for Medicaid planning." Even families in crisis situations can preserve assets and access care with the right legal strategy.

- “Estate planning is only for the wealthy.” In fact, middle-class families often benefit the most from proactive planning to protect their hard-earned assets.

Changes to Medicaid Laws in 2025: What You Need to Know

Medicaid laws are constantly evolving, and New York State is expected to implement a 2.5-year lookback period for Community Medicaid benefits in 2025. This change will impact home health aid and assisted living eligibility. Moriah advises families to begin planning now to maximize available benefits.
